Hello,

I just heard about this issue and the fact that such a large source of fresh water could be expended so much more rapidly greatly concerns me. Not only is taking 7 million gallons per day out an extremely large and unreasonable amount, but treating the water to put a fraction of it back in will use a large amount of energy and risk contamination of the entirety of the Great Lakes. Although I realize the company would create some jobs for US residents, I do not believe this is even comparable to the amount of irreversible environmental damage that it would cause. I have lived in the northern Chicago suburbs my entire life, and just moved to Auburn University for school and although I realize it might be late in the process, I'd gladly do everything in my power to get the Auburn community involved in this issue and have spread the word to close friends of mine in universities across the country that I know would do the same at their respective schools. Since the company is a technology company some might assume that my age group (~20 year olds) would support the cause, but myself along with a multitude of people in my life are already expressing great concern for our own and future generations' access to fresh water.
I'm working to spread the word as fast and far as possible, and hope that I can help to avoid this permanent environmental issue.

Thanks,
Jacqueline Rosborough
